Cnet is reporting that there is a new version of Firefox on the way.

The Mozilla Foundation has announced that a new version of Firefox has been released although at the moment it's really only suitable for experienced users and developers. The final safe version should be available by the end of October.

The new version will have a new look with several very different features. The toolbar will be see-through until you need to use it and a new way of bookmarking sites will be available. The new version will also come with some new security features as well.

I have to admit that I am not a fan of Firefox and seldom use it but Stuart loves it and runs it on his main desktops and the security features certainly do make it attractive.
